The attacker starts from the accounts. Data is the target of most attackers; the user's account is one of the most important keys to attack. All attacks will link up with accounts associated with processes or programs being compromised. So, attackers normally start by compromising systems with weak passwords or previously stolen passwords. Then, through the compromised accounts, attackers will further explore to obtain privileged accounts in the system or the entire environment. We should define monitoring mechanisms for the use of seldom used accounts and privilege accounts.
